Final Grade: C

Total Score: 7.0

Summary

The essay argues that Arthur's path is determined by fate, citing Merlin's predestined claim on him at birth and Uther's deathbed blessing as evidence of his destined kingship.

Criterion 1

Score: 4.0 The references to Merlin claiming Arthur (chapters II-III) and Uther's blessing (chapter IV) are accurate and directly drawn from the text, showing good recall of early plot points involving destiny.

Criterion 2

Score: 3.0 The argument identifies predetermination as fate but provides only basic connections without analyzing fortune or providence in depth; examples support the claim but the response is brief and one-sided.

Overall Comment

The essay uses pertinent early examples to illustrate fate effectively, though expanding on fortune and providence would better address the full scope of the question.

Name: Uziel Sierra You could say that Arthur is controlled by fate because when he was first born, Merlin came to claim him. As it was predetermined before he was born that Merlin would take him to raise as his own. And also, when Arthur's biological father Uther fell sick with a grave illness, Merlin and others asked Uther if his son Arthur would succeed him. Uther said, "I give him God's blessing and with mine, let him rule with honor rightfully as king, be king, the crown." This shows that it was also fate for Arthur to be king after his late father Uther.
