

Student: Matthew Ryan

Final Grade: C

Total Score: 7.0

Summary

Arthur is controlled by fate, demonstrated by his divine selection through the sword in the stone and survival in battles, which align with God's providential plan rather than random fortune.

Criterion 1

Score: 4.0 The essay effectively links fate to providence (God's plan) and implicitly contrasts it with fortune's uncertainty, showing a solid grasp of these concepts in the Arthurian context.

Criterion 2

Score: 3.0 Relevant examples from the text, such as pulling the sword and leading battles against rebels, are used to support the argument, though they could be more detailed with chapter-specific details.

Overall Comment

This response clearly ties key events to fate and providence, providing a focused analysis suitable for 10th-grade level. Expanding on how fortune might play a role could add balance.

Essay Text (excerpt)

Complete a rough draft on your own paper before writing your finished draft here. Cannot turn in without a rough draft. Name: Matthew Ryan Arthur is controlled by fate, not by fortune. This is proven when he pulls the sword from the stone when many have failed time and time again. When people learned of this, some said it's a sign from God, while others said it's a lie, so he proved his right over and over. This made him king because it was said whoever could pull it out would be king. When he was crowned king, he led many battles against rebel kings. Arthur survived because of fate, God's plan. He never knew if one battle was going to be his last. Fate is always unknown to man, but God knows what fate brings upon everyone. Therefore, that controls it is God's plan upon Arthur.
